

LITERARY NOTES.

Two volumes of Mr. Henry Adams's work on "The History of Political Parties in the United States" have been completed.

M. de Banville has proposed to judge every metaphor by the simple and ingenious test: Can you make a picture of it?

The indefatigable Mr. Buchanan has written another novel which is to be published by the Appletons. It will be called "Mott: A Tale of a Caravan."

Bazaroff, the Nihilist, in "Fathers and Sons," was of all the characters Turgeneff created his own favorite. Some one observing one that the man was a caricature, the novelist exclaimed: "Oh, no! Bazaroff was no caricature; he was my favorite hero, on whose account I quarreled with Kostoff. I never wished to wound the feelings of youth." "Bazaroff," he says in a letter, "dominates all other types. I wanted him to be heroic. He is honest, truthful, and a Democrat to the backbone."

Turgeneff had not a particularly high opinion of the English authors of his time. Writing in '72 to a friend, he said: "I wish I could recommend you something strikingly good in English literature; but it is quite impossible. Modern English poets are all Rossettis, which means terribly affected and unreal. Alphonse Swinburne is an exception, in him alone you find sparks of real talent. He imitates Victor Hugo, but there is genuine passion in him, while Hugo composes his feeling. Read Swinburne's 'Song before Sunrise.' Now and then he is slightly misty; still, you'll enjoy the reading."

The volume on California in the "American Commonwealth" series is to be written by Mr. Josiah Royce, of Cambridge.

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

New Publications.

ALL THE RECEPTIONS, IN HOME JOURNAL, OUT TO DAY. For sale everywhere 5 cents.

52 A year's subscription, $1.00.

MORNING CALL, 50c. 3 Park Place, New-York.

HISTORY IN RHYME. By Mrs. Rev. GARDNER. It makes the study of history an agreeable pastime.—Illustrated. $1.00.

THE CIVIL SERVICE. IN THE UNITED STATES. (From the Reports of 1884.)

Contains Catalogue of all Non-Elective Positions, with the Compensation of each, and full information in regard to the Open Competitive Examinations under the act of 1883; also, a Description of the Civil Service of the States of New-York and Massachusetts, and their Maintenance under recent Laws. By John M. Comstock, Chairman of the United States Board of Examiners for the Customs Service in New-York City. 12mo. $2. HENRY HOLT & CO., New-York.

WHO WROTE IT? JULIAN HAWTHORNE WRITES. "I GUESS JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL'S 'WILLIAM OF BELLINGHALL' OF

"WILLIAM OF BELLINGHALL." PRICES, $1.50—$2.00.

FUNK & WAGNALLS, Publishers, 10 and 12 DEVST. NEW-YORK.

GERMAN SIMPLIFIED. Easy new method of learning German, postage paid, stamp or prospectus. BRENTANO BROS., 5 Union Square.

OLD BOOKS BOUGHT. Highest price paid for OLD and NEW BOOKS in large and small lots; ENCYCLOPEDIAS wanted. ARUNDEL BOOKSTORE, No. 24 West 14th-st., New-York.

THE TRIBUNE ALMANAC FOR 1885.

This valuable Political Register compiled by Hon. EDWARD MCPHERSON, late Clerk of the House of Representatives, contains:

Election Returns from every State in the Union.

Alphabetically arranged, with comparative tables of the Presidential Election of 1880.

By Committee, also an analysis of the Presidential Elections of 1856, 1872, 1880 and 1884. Also a Foreign Postage Table, Bank and Currency Tables, Party Platforms, Election of U.S. Senators, List of Governors of the Several Territories, New-York State Government, Acts of Congress, Orders from Customs, Internal Revenue Receipts, Foreign Legations in U.S., U.S. Debt Statement, XLIXTH Congress, Appropriations for 1882-3, 1883-4 and 1884-5.

ORDINARY REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES OF THE U.S., TABLES OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF SPECIE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC MERCHANDISE, FOREIGN TRADE, VALUE OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS, Members of U.S. Senate and House of Representatives, The United States Government, Principal Officers in the Various Departments, Principal Diplomatic Officers of U.S. in Foreign Countries, A List of Sheriffs and County Clerks in New-York State, Election Returns of New-York by Towns and Counties, &c., &c., &c.

PRICE 30 CENTS. FIVE COPIES FOR $1.

THE TRIBUNE, THE TRIBUNE, New-York.

Practical Cookery.

NINE LECTURES ON COOKING BY MISS MARIA PAOLINA.

A SERIES OF KITCHEN LESSONS WITH DEMONSTRATIONS. TRIBUNE EXTRA, NO. 85.—PRICE, 25 CENTS.

ADDRESS THE TRIBUNE, New-York.

PRACTICAL COOKERY.

For Boys and Young Men—CITY.

BUSINESS EDUCATION, Bookkeeping, Writing, Arithmetic Correspondence, Spelling, Penmanship, Drawing, Painting, and every other subject taught in College, 62 Bowery, uptown, 1313 Broadway, entrance 107 34th-st.

COLLEGE GRAMMAR SCHOOL, 15 East 42d-st.

FRANK DRISLER, A. M., PRINCIPAL.

Robertson's Family of Columns, 35th-street 411 School of Music.

UNIVERSITY GRAMMAR SCHOOL, 1147 Broadway, 1st fl., 43d-street. Primary, Commercial, Classical Department, Institute, Robertson's, M. M. HORRY, W. L. ALLEN, Principals.

For Young Ladies—CITY.

MRS. J. C. GALLAHER, 450 MADISON-AVE., Brooklyn, and DAY SCHOOL.

A thorough French education. Highest standard in English and classical studies. Separate and limited class in French and English for those who like it.

Instruction.

For Young Ladies—CITY.

A.—33 WEST 130TH-ST.—The Misses Jacob's School for Young Ladies; thoroughly graded course; limited number of young boys, Kindergarten.

M. de Banville has proposed to judge every metaphor by the simple and ingenious test: Can you make a picture of it?

The indefatigable Mr. Buchanan has written another novel which is to be published by the Appletons. It will be called "Mott: A Tale of a Caravan."

Bazaroff, the Nihilist, in "Fathers and Sons," was of all the characters Turgeneff created his own favorite. Some one observing one that the man was a caricature, the novelist exclaimed: "Oh, no! Bazaroff was no caricature; he was my favorite hero, on whose account I quarreled with Kostoff. I never wished to wound the feelings of youth." "Bazaroff," he says in a letter, "dominates all other types. I wanted him to be heroic. He is honest, truthful, and a Democrat to the backbone."

Turgeneff had not a particularly high opinion of the English authors of his time. Writing in '72 to a friend, he said: "I wish I could recommend you something strikingly good in English literature; but it is quite impossible. Modern English poets are all Rossettis, which means terribly affected and unreal. Alphonse Swinburne is an exception, in him alone you find sparks of real talent. He imitates Victor Hugo, but there is genuine passion in him, while Hugo composes his feeling. Read Swinburne's 'Song before Sunrise.' Now and then he is slightly misty; still, you'll enjoy the reading."

The volume on California in the "American Commonwealth" series is to be written by Mr. Josiah Royce, of Cambridge.

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostolical activity was prodigious. Even in camp he often dashed off more than twenty letters a day with his own hand, besides those which he dictated to his secretaries; and it is believed that his correspondence during the eighteen years in which, as General, First Consul, and Emperor, he was the foremost man in France, amounted to not less than 20,000 papers.

Miss Louisa Alcott is ill from overwork and entirely unable to finish her book, "Jo's Boys and how They Turned Out."

There is something of truth in this statement of the French critic, Daryl, concerning Anthony Trollope: "A good father, a good husband, a good post-office official, a great fox-hunter, and, moreover, a man of letters, he does not leave behind him the name of a great author, but that of a man who has succeeded in the business of writing as he would have succeeded as a grocer; and if he has left no great work as a landmark of his fame, of how many men of letters can ever be as much as this be said!"

There is a movement in New Haven for the foundation of a public library.

Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia has published a magnificent edition of his account of his travels in the Orient. It is illustrated from his drawings and those of his fellow-travellers.

Captain Bingham, who seems to have devoted himself to Napoleonic literature, has just published in three volumes an English version of the more interesting portions of the correspondence of Napoleon I. Fifteen volumes of these letters were published in France during the first years of the second Empire; but "when," "The London Times" says, "it became a question of printing letters which showed that Napoleon had ordered a wholesale forgery of English bank notes that might injure the credit of the Bank of England, the Commission recurred. The Emperor was consulted, and a new Commission was issued under the Presidency of Prince Napoleon who announced that for the future nothing would be published except what Napoleon himself would have agreed that the world should see." A mass of letters remain unpublished—and many have been destroyed.

Napoleon's apostol